The anti-trust assault on Microsoft is immoral and anti-American. The government is attempting to punish Microsoft for the same moral values that have helped make America the beacon of the world: hard work, creativity, achievement. Unlike kings of the past and governments of the present, Microsoft has acquired its wealth -- not by confiscation -- but by production, by creating products that people want to buy.

Politicians have been bought by Microsoft's competitions to bring suit against Microsoft. Since they are unable to compete fairly then they resort to gaining political pull. Then government pawns can cripple their opponent for them.

That's what this anti-trust suit against Microsoft is all about. It has nothing to do with serving the public. If the government truly was interested in the public good, it would leave Microsoft alone and the government would stop interfering by "regulating" business. All the government does is cripple some business so their competitors can take over.

The anti-trust suit should be abolished. Microsoft should be left alone.
